

DESIGN-BUILD IN THE PUBLIC SECTOR

LUNCHEON MEETING

Wednesday, June 29, 2011

Design-build procurement for construction projects is becoming more common in the Hawaii market, with government agencies leading the way. The end results have been mixed for all participants, including owners, and the failings have left many reluctant to embrace the practices that lead to success.

Craig Unger, a leader of the design-build movement in the federal works sector, will share his previous experiences with project procurement. Find out why he began using the design-build process, how the transition was made, and the results. Along with key lessons learned, Craig will explain how RFPs can be developed to avoid protests and how proposals can be prepared to respond to the RFP and win projects.

GUEST SPEAKER

Craig Unger is Principal and CEO of Unger Security Solutions, LLC, providing consulting services for acquisition management, project delivery, and the security and detention environment.

Mr. Unger served as President of DBIA from 2003-4 and is a nationally recognized instructor, lecturer, and author on design-build procurement.

Before joining DBIA, Mr. Unger served for 26 years at the US Department of Justice, primarily as the Procurement Executive for the Federal Bureau of Prisons where he led the Agency's design and construction program from a "low bid" approach to an integrated, design-build delivery system.

He also served as a design and construction consultant for the US State Department, and the US Army Corps of Engineers on various major federal projects, including US Embassies worldwide.
